It makes sense for a company running a secondary server to "request access" to a primary Sandpiper installation. I've placed a new route at "/" which returns html like this:

REGISTER

Terms & Conditions

Note that it asks for their Sandpiper Server ID. This shows that they have installed a server. The idea is that pressing REGISTER would initiate the "contract" process. Most probably, it would send an email to the Sandpiper admin.

That means we need to use an SMTP server somewhere (or include one in Sandpiper). We might also want a CAPTCHA to keep robots away (although requiring a server id allows us to check for a valid UUID, which might be enough).

It's never easy.

This registration screen should not be confused with an administration login (or registration) screen.

We plan on building a separate admin front-end tool to administer a sandpiper installation. It would do things like maintain users, companies, slices, subscriptions, etc.
